

Brief Summary

The topic dominating this week's calls to Radio Ergo (16-21 October 2020), as in the previous week, was the invasion of new waves of desert locusts, especially across northern and central regions. There was also an increase in the number of people reporting scarcity of water and concerns over food security from various regions. The following summarises the calls by theme.

Locusts – the biggest number of calls this week came from the central Somalia regions, with the highest volume from Adado and Abudwak in Galgadud. Other Galgadud locations producing calls included Dusamareb, El-bur, Guriel, Galhareri, Hananbure, Hiindhare, Biyo-Gadud, and Balli-hawd. (Note that some callers to our platform either do not identify their location, or give imprecise information on location). Callers described incoming swarms of flying locusts, locusts eating grassland and crops, and larvae covering the ground. The majority called for intervention and control from relevant authorities and aid organisations. A caller in Balli-hawd said the locals were fighting the locusts but were unable to control them without the help of governmental authorities. In Dusamareb, a caller said the authorities should spray or give the people the pesticides to do it themselves. A female caller in Biyo-gadud thanked the aerial spraying team for coming there. The majority in Adado wanted intervention but one caller cautioned about potential harm caused by chemicals to livestock, and another warned that the spraying was harmful to people's health. In Abduwak, a female caller said the locusts were now their primary concern. Another female said the locusts were affecting pastoralist communities and, in turn, damaging the local economy. Callers in Mudug (including Hobyo, Jarriban, Hero-Dagahley, Bulo-Sarman) described the horizon being obliterated by locust swarms. Some asked for aerial spraying, others asked what effects the locusts would have on the soil. Communities in Hobyo said they had just received rainfall after a long period of drought, but the locusts had also arrived. In Somaliland, callers from Togdher, Sanag, Sool and other unspecified locations called on the government to act. One caller said the Somaliland and Ethiopian governments needed to cooperate over the locusts. Communities described swarms of insects flying in, larvae on the ground, and livestock and farm produce being affected. However, one caller in Bo'ame said the locusts should be left alone because they came with the blessing of rain. In Puntland, most callers wanted help to stop the devastation of grazing land and farms, whilst one in Darinbar village linked the spraying of locusts to the delayed or poor rainfall. Locust sightings in the south came from Hiran (Mahas, Beletweyn), M. Shabelle (Bananey), Gedo (Belethawo), and other farming areas not well identified. All wanted help to protect their livelihoods from the damaging effects of the locusts.

Water scarcity – most calls about drought and water shortage came from northern regions, with a few also from central and south. Communities in parts of Somaliland spoke of weakened livestock without water, and general shortages of water and food. Callers in Ainabo (Togdher) said their water had run out and barrels were being sold at two dollars and rising. Water and livestock fodder were lacking in Balli-dhiig. There were calls from Badhan, Erigabo, and Garadag in northern Sanag. A community in Ras-Cadeeye (Erigabo) said the reservoir serving 500 families had been buried and they needed help in restoring the facility. A few callers wanted more detailed and regular rainfall and weather updates for their planning. IDPs in Buhodle (Togdher), Bardera (Gedo), and Mahas (Hiran) said they needed aid. On the other hand, we had repeat calls from displaced families in Wanleweyn (L. Shabelle), who told Radio Ergo that more than a dozen villages were affected by earlier flooding and no help had been received there.

Coronavirus – there were only a handful of calls on this topic from Sanag and Bari. One asked if the virus would resurge during the cold season. A student in Qardo said they feared going to school due to lack of measures in place. Another female caller in Qardo said people had neglected the guidelines and those wearing masks were stigmatized.

Other calls were collected for our Radio Vet and Farming programmes aired weekly.
